

Critical Infrastructure Security and Resilience Month

President Obama designated November as Critical Infrastructure Security and Resilience Month to recognize the importance of strengthening our nation's infrastructure and enhancing our homeland security and resilience.

Our nation's critical infrastructure provides the essential services that support American society. It provides the power we use in our homes, the water we drink, the transportation that gets us from place to place, the bridges that connect us and the communication systems on which we rely to stay in touch with friends and family.

Safeguarding critical infrastructure against growing and evolving threats – both physical and cyber – requires a whole community effort. Read the President's proclamation and find out what you can do to make your home, business and community more resilient.
